Importance of obituaries in research

Genealogy Corner

By Ella Buzzard

When I read the newspaper, the first page I turn to is the obituary page to see who has died. Obituaries are very important to the family researcher. A person's obituary is a good way to document the exact date and place of death, because it is usually written shortly after the death. It can also be a valuable tool which will give insight into how the deceased lived his/her life.

One of the first things I look for in an obituary is the name of the survivors. Today's newspapers give the names of the parents, the spouse, the children, the siblings, grandchildren and even other special persons who knew and loved that person. Many times, the article will name the relatives who preceded the person in death.

However, that was not the case in the old newspapers. Many times the names of the parents of the deceased were not mentioned. Therefore, the researcher must find another way to locate the parents and move on to the next generation. If the brothers and sisters are named, then each one of their obituaries can be checked to see if the parents are listed. Obituaries are helpful because they give the married name of the women survivors and their residence at the time.

Obituaries will most generally tell where the person was living and how long he/she had lived in that community. Many times the article will include information about other places the person had lived. The occupation and military service is also included. Church, social, political and ethnic affiliations are usually mentioned.

The older newspapers, more so than the newspapers of the present, will name the cause of death. Sometimes one can figure out the cause of death by what organization whereto the contributions can be made or by contacting the funeral home which was in charge of the services.

Sometimes the newspaper article will characterize the person's life by giving various highlights of his/her time on earth which may include favorite hobbies, trips taken, or other accomplishments achieved.

The date and place of birth is usually mentioned, but one should locate another record to prove and verify that information, as the informant may not be sure of the date and place of birth. I have seen instances where the birth is off two or three years.

An obituary for a particular person can probably be found in the newspaper which was printed in the community or area where he/she lived. I found a very informative obituary for my great grandmother in 1913 in the newspaper in the community where her daughter lived. Sometimes it pays to check more than one newspaper. Each newspaper will give a different viewpoint and may be an extra clue which will answer questions about the mystery person. For a long time Columbus had two newspapers and in the 1900's the two newspapers were in competition with each other to print the best story.

Today, obituaries are placed online at the local newspaper, funeral home and television station websites. Starting in the 1990's many newspapers have archived their obituaries online.

Other websites, which are adding obituaries past and present to their agenda include www.newspapers, findagrave.com, www.obituaries.com and www.ancestry.com.

The Cherokee County Kansas Genealogical-Historical Library is located at 100 S. Tennessee in Columbus and is open from 1 p.m. to 5 p.m. Tuesday thru Friday. The phone number is 620-429-2992.
