occasions.

Kansas also saw roughly the same number of night-to-night placements from 2021 to 2022, which cause advocates concern as they mean increased instability for children in their living, social and educational situations.

In a news release, DCF said it had taken steps to address these trends since the time period covered in the report, pointing to new initiatives bankrolled by the Legislature earlier this year.

In a statement, Gov. Laura Kelly acknowledged the report "makes clear that, in spite of all of our efforts, there's much more work to be done" and said it was a sign "the legislature and I must dig deeper, make more targeted investments, and come up with solutions that work" on the overnight placement issue.

DCF pointed to other areas of improvement, such as meeting their goal for maintaining stability in foster care placements and progress in providing access to mental health services.

"My administration continues to make progress in protecting Kansas kids in the foster care system and repairing the state's child welfare system," Kelly said in a statement.

The state saw backsliding as well. In 2021, Kansas met its goal for the number of times a child changes foster care placements per 1,000 children but in 2022 it saw a rise that meant it missed the mark.

Sen. Molly Baumgardner, R-Louisburg, said the results of the report were worrying as, despite an increase in funding, she felt the foster care system remained stuck.

"The settlement was very prescriptive," said Baumgardner, who chairs the Senate Education Committee. "We were to follow an agreement and my concern is we are heading right back to court because the state is not complying."

Access to mental health services has been an area of concern for state lawmakers and foster families alike — an important topic, experts say, with a 2016 study estimating that between 50%-80% of all foster children nationally needed mental health support.

The report noted that while the percentage of children who had their behavioral health needs addressed had increased to 70%, a timely mental health and trauma screening was only delivered for 43% of all youths. While an increase from 2021, that is roughly half as many as the state agreed to reach in the settlement.

The state has said a new model to help health clinics get more money to offer comprehensive behavioral health services will bolster care for children, with all community mental health centers across the state set to become licensed. Officials also have touted a new statewide mobile crisis team targeted at young people.

"We expect to see this number continue to improve as more (certified community behavioral health centers) come online and more families across the state become aware of the youth mobile crisis service," DCF Secretary Laura Howard said in a statement.

DCF Secretary Laura Howard said the state expected to see more foster youths access mental health services as new initiatives rolled out. ANDREW BAHL/THE CAPITAL-JOURNAL

Report comes as Kansas seeks new foster care contractors

The report's release comes as DCF evaluates which outside vendors it will retain to provide foster care services in Kansas, which was the first state to privatize most all elements of the child welfare system.

Four of the five bidders seeking to be a foster care case management provider, the most prominent and high-profile firms used in the state's mostly privatized child welfare system, already serve as contractors. That means at least some of the same firms will likely continue to serve as contractors, despite complaints from those within the foster care system over their performance.

The formal document soliciting proposals, however, did include new language, which the Center for the Study of Social Policy cheered, limiting how many foster care cases those staff members can take on at a given time.

Two of the current contractors, KVC of Kansas and Saint Francis Ministries, had at least one staffer with over 45 cases, despite requirements currently that they not exceed 25-30 cases.

"DCF must hold its contractors accountable for meeting the commitments of the settlement agreement and provide vigorous oversight of their care of Kansas children in the foster system, or we will not see improvement in the system," Teresa Woody, litigation director for Kansas Appleseed, said in a statement.

Baumgardner echoed that sentiment, noting it remained concerning that the state was only seeing familiar faces seeking to work as contractors.

"We settled on a class action lawsuit," she said. "Everyone that is employed by DCF and everyone that is employed by the contractors knew there are to be zero children spending the night in offices, yet it is still happening."

The state is also seeking vendors for a more comprehensive data system, which will help address multiple categories where the report's authors said they were not able to obtain adequate data to evaluate Kansas' performance, something that troubled advocates.

Longbine said this would also give the public a chance to get used to the idea of finding notices on the website as opposed to in the newspaper.

In the end, the commissioners voted 5-0 in favor of "chartering out" of the Kansas statute. The issue will face a second reading and vote, most likely at the next scheduled regular meeting. If passed on second reading, the ordinance will be published and have 60 days of a possible petition period before it goes into effect.

Other commission business

The Salina City Commission meeting also included the following items:

- Approval, on first reading, an ordinance levying special assessments against properties for the cost of abatement of nuisances.
- Voting unanimously to authorize the mayor to sign a letter by the Salina Area Chamber of Commerce to ask Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Kansas and Salina Regional Health Center to continue negotiations on the issue of placing the health center out of network.
- Approval of a resolution to submit a grant application to the Federal Home Loan Bank Topeka for the Affordable Housing Program.
